uram." With his left hand, he took the word of the singer, and after kissing his hand, as the custom is with the ladies of the upper classes, he turned back with the Greek and the Latin expressions to his teacher. She was about to return the kiss, but the Tzigani, in his wild way, took her hand and touched it to his lips. The teacher was very confused, but not so with the Greek. She knew that this was a high act, and she was not disposed to give her approval to such an action. The Tzigani therefore plunged into a genteel apology, which resulted in the Greek being at once convinced of the authenticity of his apology. Then followed a magnificent concert. The Tzigani was now in Vienna, and about that time I was spending a few days there. His friends the Kolokolski and Kolomska had a very interesting house. Some gentlemen whose acquaintance I had made in Poland and France were also present, as was also a lady, who was entertaining the gentlemen and who was the mother of the Tzigani. This lady is a person of consequence in the Russian world, and her circle gives a great number of balls. The affair was very gay, but the Tzigani, who was deeply interested in everything connected with Polish life and art, gave himself up without reserve to the amusement and the polite attention of the lady. They played and sang together, as well as wept over a monologue which the lady had given him. It was a monologue of the most lachrymose character, and the gentleman who had been allotted to the Tzigani as an interpreter, was utterly astonished at the difficulty he had in making himself understood by him. He was himself much amused by the whole thing, but he informed me, in an undertone, that the lady was an enthusiast in regard to the Tzigani. She had come to Vienna, had seen him and him alone, and she had paid several visitations to his hotel, in order to see him. This lady had made up her mind to marry the Tzigani, and to have him educated by her. She knew that he was a Pole and could do all that was necessary to render the future of the Tzigani an honourable and 82157476af
